

the canal bridge and down the road with her head held very high in the air. The Dedham place was just the other side of the canal, and her expedition was not so much a search for arbutus as it was declaration of feminine independ-

Almost as far back as she could remember she and Dan Dedham had sought the first arbutus together ev-ery spring. There were other wood-ed patches about the little village, but these were the Woods. All oth ers had names.

Then had come another age when Dan had gone to work and she was in the normal. Some pleasant af-ternoon, in passing his father's store, she would find Dan on the lookout for her, a bag of candy in his pocket and a mute invitation in his eyes. She would nod her assent, and pres-ently they would be off to the woods return just before supper time their arms full of fragrant blooms.

This year all that was changed. Patty had graduated and had come quaintances.

The town was just recovering from the Browning fad, and the faddists

"I'M SO GLAD YOU CAME," SAID

among the younger men and his kname, "the Suffering Ones," had nickname lung to them until it stung.

Patty would not descend to open argument with Dan, but that young nan soon found that it was a wasteful extravagance to buy two scats for entertainments when Patty always found some convenient previous engagement, and Dan would not go with any other girl.

The arbutus quest was designed to put a final rebuff upon the scoffer. The club had rapidly lost membership of late because the pioneers were unable to withstand ridicule, and Dan's nickname had been a cause more potent than all the rest,

Patty had waited until she had seen Dan go home, and then, after due interval, she had fared forth. As she auticipated, Dan was work-

As she anticipated, Dan was working in the garden, getting the flower beds in shape, and she smiled maliciously as he leaned on his rake to watch her go by, even while regret clutched her heart. She pretended not to have seen him, and, with screne unconcern, she slipped through the lease of the second through the se through the bars of the meadow lot and started across the fields.

Patty had graduated and had come to have a mission, a mission with a capital M and a world-embracing object. The preceding summer she had visited a friend in the city, and she had come home with her mind filled with arguments in favor of suffrage for women. Straightaway she had begun to form a club among her actional patterns of the patterns of the first flush of enthusiasm, for Clarisville was conservative and the same than the first flush of enthusiasm, for clarisville was conservative and the first flush of her, but all someone at her side with a stick.

The pink blooms were plentiful on the hillside. Patty knew just where to go for the best, and it was not long before her basket was full of the fragrant blossoms. She had been in the woods less than hallf an hour, and yet she was glad when the basket versioned.

When to keep his bull in this field.

"Burnham's bull" was the local synonum for all that was bad-tempered in Clarisville, and many were the tailes of its savage disposition. Patty knew the stories, but she had never before seen the bull.

He looked singularly mild for so ket overflowed.

ket overflowed.

She dropped her basket to the ground as she prepared to scramble through the bars, but she straightened up with a cry of alarm as a bull came charging toward her.

Patty snatched off her flaming red bow and stuffed it in her pocket, but still the bull was not appeased. He kept pushing his head as far over the fence as he could in his effort to reach her, and she shrank still furreach her, and she shrank still fur-ther back in alarm.

The situation was not at all pleasant. The woods were to be reached only across a valley back of the ridge, and through this ran a small but rapid stream, too deep to be waded and too wide to be crossed at a jump. A rude bridge was thrown across the stream here—the only means of cross-he asked. "If I had known that you wanted to come today I could have arranged to get off, but I had prom-

******************

Alarmed Him.

The great foreigner was surrounded by a mob of admirers.

"And give me your eye a minute," echoed another, who wanted to point out the scenery.

"And give me your nose a minute," added a third, with a huge bouquet.

The celebrated foreigner was non-

'By ze shades of Bonaparte!" he "By ze shades of Bopaparte!" he exclaimed, "I haf often heard zat ze Americans vere great souvenir hunters, but I did not know zat zey would take a man to pleces. I better get away from here while I am yet Satisfied.

"Look here!" grumbled the old far-mer. "This here almanae is a fraud. It predicted snow for yesterday and, by gum, it was not as blazes all day."
"But, my dear sir," responded the bland almanac peddler, "it snowed up at the north pole yesterday."
The old favorac's jav fell.

The old farmer's jaw fell.
"It did?" he drawled slowly. "Wal,
I reckon the almanac is all right then. It did tell the truth, didn't it?

Much Better.

Yes, he's in the has-been class, Yet he is proud because He thinks 'tis better thus by far Than to be a never-was Miss Gotrox-"The count was aw-fully embarrassed when he proposed Natural Deduction.

Said She-"I wonder how those spiritual communications are writ-

Said He-With a medium pen or pencil, I imagine.'

Too Much for Her.

A woman can easily make up her face, Likewine her figure, you'll find; But ten to one she'll not make good When she tries to make up her mind.

Exactly the Same. Askitt-"What do you know about Blank's veracity?"

Noitt-"Oh, his word is as good as Noitt—"On, us not his bond."
Askitt—"Are you sure?"
Noitt—"Yes; but his bond

vorthless."

Made Him Cross. "I made my husband cross this af-ternoon," said Mrs. Caller. "How was that?" queried Mrs.

Homer,
"He was on the opposite side of the street and I beckened him to come over," explained the other.

suffragists found little masculine sympathy.

Dan had been one of the ringlead
The pink blooms were plentiful on the suffragional to have someone at her side with a stick.

The pink blooms were plentiful on the suffragional to have someone at her side with a stick.

The pink blooms were plentiful on the suffragional to have someone at her side with a stick.

The pink blooms were plentiful on the suffragional to have someone at her side with a stick.

The pink blooms were plentiful on the suffragional to have someone at her side with a stick.

The pink blooms were plentiful on the suffragional to have someone at her side with a stick.

The pink blooms were plentiful on the suffragional to have someone at her side with a stick. owner to keep his bull in this field.
"Burnbam's bull" was the local synonum for all that was bad-tem-ferocious an animal, but she trusted not to looks, and since he commanded the only way across the hollow. she would have to make the detour by the back road and add several miles to her walk.

she was still pondering the situa-but tion, when a tall figure loomed up against the sky line on the other side the of the valley. Even in the fading to light she could recognize Dan's confident carriage, and in her terror she forgot her displeasure and screamed a warning.

Apparently Dan did not notice the bull nor realize her warning, for he waved his hand at the sound of her cry and came running down the hill toward her. "The bull!" screamed Patty. "Go back or climb a tree."

Dan made no reply, but came on across the bridge, and presently he had vaulted the fence and stood beside her before the bull had seen

"I'm so glad you came," said Patty

"Burnham's bull?" That's not Burnham's bull." "I suppose that you want to tell me that it is a cow," said Patty chillingly. "I don't suppose that I can tell a bull from a cow. Why the horas alone—"

"That is a buil," he interrupted,
"but not the buil. This one is Jess Burnham's pet. He is as meek as the meekest cow you ever saw. Jess raised him, and he follows her like a dog. He thought you had come to bring him salt. Jess always does."
"And here I was thinking that I should have to take the back road," went on Patty as she slipped through the gate and started for the bridge.

the gate and started for the bridge.

The young bull, still intent upon salt, started to follow her, but a mild "Shoo!" scared him away. At the bridge Patty payed bridge Patty paused.

'Are you coming, Dan?" she called

You don't want me now that there is no danger," he reminded.

"Perhaps that was not—all," confessed Patty shyly. "It was mean to hunt arbutus alone," she added as he came running up, "but you called my society names.

I won't do it egain," he promised, "If you'll make a life contract to hunt arbutus with me. Is it a bargain?" "If you say you're sorry," she stipulated

softly. "I'll never come to the woods alone again."

"Why did you do it this time?"
ised mother to get her flower beds only because of the bull," she exready, and once I had started I did

THEIR PLAN

ARLETON

RLETON SANFORD regarded, with a pleased smile, the little pile of packages and letters beside his plate. The other boarders looked up with pleasant greetings as he took his place, and Sanford deplaced by the point of making a definite proposal of marriage.

As quickly as he could he made his escape from the table without making and Sanford deplace, and Sanford deplace and Sanford dep with pleasant greetings as he took his place, and Sanford decided that it was a pleasant thing to have a birthday.

He turned first to the letters and opened before the others the familiar blue square which always covered Janet Bryce's notes.

As quickly as he could he made his escape from the table without making any display of his other packages and, presently, he had started on a brisk walk to the office.

On the way, Cady's taunt kept ringing through his head. Perhaps, after all, Janet had sent the book. It was leap year and girls sometimes did avail themselves of their legendary privileges.

It was just a line or two wishing dary privileges.

bim a pleasant birthday and adding! He could not altogether blame her that she had ordered a book sent him if she had. It was four years since string. It was probably the "Dictionary of Science" he had asked her to price for him, but instead the book bore the title, "Three Thousand Dol-lar Homes," and Jack Cady, who liked to consider himself a humorist, laughed joyously:

" THE IDEA," EXCLAIMED JANET.

"It's from a lady." he declared "It's a new sort of leap year proposal. I call that real neat."

"It's a book I ordered the other day," insisted Sanford stoutly, but that Sanford found courage to speak is crimson face betrayed him, and of the book and give proper thanks. through the rest of the meal he glow ered at Cady, who insisted upon telling stories of friends of his who had started to build $3,000 houses and had found they were compelled to pay anywhere from $5.000 to $10,000."

was unpleasant, and Sanford was which would come direct from the store, as they did not have it in stock.

The package was there and with nervous fingers Sanford untied the string. It was probably the "Dictionary of Science" he had asked her to making any effort to win Janet's fa-making any effort to win Janet's favor.

Soon she would be regarded as a confirmed old maid. She had a right to hint. He went to the telephone as soon as he reached the office and made an appointment to meet her the sometime of the plans, there is only one thing more threed." made an appointment to meet her for dinner.

It was not until the coffee came

"I'm glad that it got there in time, "I'm glad that it got there in time."
red at Cady, who insisted upon fellng stories of friends of his who had tarted to build $3,000 houses and ad found they were compelled to pay nywhere from $5,000 to $10,000."

To a bashful man, the situation

"I'm glad that it got there in time."
said Janet with a smile. "It is not kept in stock and they had to send for it, but they promised to get it there by last night if they possibly could. I don't see what you want of such a silly thing."

"I think it is better to go to an

"That book of plans for $3,000 houses," he said innocently, Janet glanced at his wine glass. It was still half full. It could not be that. "I don't know anything about a house," she said. "What has that to do with the book?"

"You can't get out of it that way," asserted Sanford with a laugh. "I needed the hint. Why should you try to deny the book

"I'm not trying to deny the book," she said a trifle crossly, "but what has the 'Dictionary of Science' to do with houses and what house are you talking about?"

"The house I'm going to build on that lot I bought a couple of years ago," he explained. "I'm going to build if you'll promise to marry me and live in it. I think, after all, that we'll pick out one of the houses in the house." "There are no plans in the dictionsaid Janet, regarding him anx-y. "What is the matter, Carl?

are you mixing houses and ooks and plans?' "It's all right; it's leap year," he reminded, "but don't tell me that you sent me the 'Dictionary of Science." He probably proposed because he couldn't afford to do otherwise."

Notwel Deletion

Cess.

As school was dismissed he was told to make friends with his late antagonist and he had refused. Therefore he was detained as punishment. an be built for $3,000, if you can dream as well as the man who draws

"But I, ordered the dictionary sent," she insisted.

"And they sent the plans," he explained. "It's some mistake in the delivery room, but I thought you were trying to make a leap-year suggestion that it was about time we had a

"The idea," exclaimed Janet.

"The money for building?" asked the unsuspecting Janet.

"You," said Sanford fervently Won't you complete the outfit,

Janet laughed, but her eyes were swer, "You don't deserve an an-swer," she declared, "to such an ab-surd proposal, but I'll—I'll complete the outfit, dear, if you'll promise not to say that I proposed to you."

HATEANDLO

"BURNHAM'S BULL."

Patty's spirit rose at his prompt ry?" demanded Jean did not know what the long word meant, but he was certain that he over the tiny figure nuddled at the desk.

"You are the little boy who was "You are later"

Georgie Bynum shook his head. "Harry is a bad boy," he said severe-"I hate him.

Jean took the little fellow on her p. "But you must not hate him or anyone." she said in the soft tones hat seemed almost a caress. wrong to hate,' "Don't you ever hate no one?" de-manded Georgie, "not even him?"

He pointed awesomely toward the principal, dimly visible through the glass partitions dividing the classes. It was Prof. Webster's habit poke his head into the classroom dozen times a day and glance severe-ly over the rows of hushed and ex-pectant scholars. To Georgie these visits were terrifying.

The professor always seemed to be on the lookout for small victims to take up on the high platform, there to squirm under his frowning gaze until he considered that they had been sufficiently punished. He himself had spent part of the afternoon on the platform because of a fight in which he had engaged during re-

He did not mind staying in. It was no great punishment when he could sit at the desk and watch Miss Thay-er's pretty face bent over the exercise books. He was still impenitent but gently the girl coaxed him into a softer mood, and in the end she kissed the tearful face and told him that he might go.

in gentle tones she had explained too. that hatred was an evil thing, but most astonishing was the fact that eryothe "teacher" loved appearance. Her lesson had sunk in deeply, as the "teacher" loved everyone, even including the terrifying principal. He was strong in his determination to follow her example and love everyone, but he was pretty sure that he could not bring himself to love the professor, no matter how willing he

The grave eyes behind the goldmight be to forget his anger at Harry bowed speciacles twinkled as they re approached the dreaded desk, but the faint hope that he might pass the principal without observation died as Webster looked sharply over the edge of his desk.

"You were detained after school?"

"You were detained after school?"

ILL you be a good boy he asked severely. "I am afraid you fact that the ogre had given him as now and make are incorrigible." an inchest.

It is now and make are incorrigible." I ain't," said George stoutly. He has the door downstairs banged. are incorrigible."
"I ain't," said George stoutly. He As was not as bad as that.

"You are the little boy who sent to the desk this afternon?" demanded the professor. "I believe you were fighting. What was the last trouble?"

"You are later than usual," said the principal kindly as she passed the desk. "I am afraid that in punishing your refractory pupil you have punished yourself more."

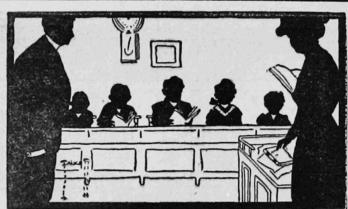

and teacher kept me in," explained the boy. "I'm going to be good now," he added virtuously.

"It is to be hoped so," was the "It is to be hoped so," was the "He is a dear little fellow," said "He is a smile. "I think I shall word Jeans came from the classrom, dress-

"I had to go over the exercise books," she explained, "and I had a little talk with Georgie."

be as bad as you have been today I Jean with a smile. "I think I shall am afraid that something dreadful have no more trouble with him." will happen. No one loves bad little "He has put me under deep obliga-

IT WAS PROF. WEBSTER'S HABIT TO POKE HIS HEAD INTO THE ROOM ABOUT A DOZEN TIMES A DAY.

Teacher does," defended Georgie. "She says it's wicked to hate anyone. She loves everyone. She loves you,

"I presume so, since she loves evryone," was the quiet response. Georgie climbed the stairs in arnestness to defend his idol.

"But she loves you specially," he explained. "I asked her did she love you and she got red and said 'Yes,' might be to forget his anger at Harry Sangston.

Presently his little feet went pattering down the long corridor formed by the partitions. The heavy little boots fell with lighter tread as they apples on the cart on the corner?

tion," said Webster gravely, "He has made a discovery that interests me He tells me that you said you loved me.'

"That was a part of the lesson," stammered Jean, the crimson flooding her face. "He picked you out as the most awesome person he could think of. I had to say 'yes' to be consist-ent."

"And it was solely in the interest of the moral lesson?" he questioned shrewdly. "I may not hope that your confession was based on fact?'

"I do not dislike you, of course," explained Jean. "We were only talking of love for a fellow-man." But I am talking now of the love of a man for a woman," went on Webster. "Don't you think that you might learn to love me-Jean? SureTHE WAY

ly you must have seen that I loved you. "I told Georgie the truth," she con-

that when the idea

the idea and thereby providing the em-bryonic organization with an enemy in the shape of Clyde Lillard who seemed, unreasonably enough, to be-lieve that he was better worthy of devoted her time to the outworking of neve that he was better worthy of attention than this idea for a summer club for the girls Amy knew.

"Adamless Eden" was the least uncomplimentary of the names Clyde applied to the club. For two years he had been seeking to hold Amy's interest long. interest long enough to convince her that she loved him, but Amy's pretthat she loved him, but Amy's pret-ty little head was filled with schemes ideal dormitories.

the town to render the purchase of supplies a matter of ease.

There were only five acres of ground, bare, stony soll from which the scanty stock of nutriment had long since been exhausted by a faulty farming plan. Now rank grass cov-ered the meadow and young trees were beginning to replace the wood lot sacrificed when the Beekman for-

Only the house was still worth while and this was what had first for philanthropic work and she gave herself unreservedly to her fads,

This newest idea was the purchase of the old Beekman property and making it over into a club for the working it over into a club for the wo the summer, more enthusiastic than ever about the plan. It required only her father's consent—and financial assistance—to make the dream a reality and he had promised to come up the following week to look the place over. When Amy received his letter she which any learning with a minute smilingly set out to make a minute inventory of the many advantages of the house.

She frowned as on her approach she perceived Clyde on the porch, comfortably smoking a cigarette. He had even raised the drawbridge and the stream was just a trifle too wide to be jumped.

"Of course," was the reply, rather more sharp than Amy's usual tone, "Father will be here Monday and I want to make a note of all the good points of the place, so that in my excitement I shall not forget anything. I wish that you would go away, Clyde. You know that I need to be a sound to be a s making it over into a club for the weeks' stay would leave money in I was that you would go away, clyde, working girls in whom she took such slender purses at the end of the valvou know that I never can think cation time.

The Beakman place was an plan
Every afternoon she visited the "I like that!" cried Clyde in mock to Beekman?" demanded Amy laugh-

'I didn't," explained Clyde.

nerely changed the Beekman place over to my name."
"You bought this place?" gaspec Amy. "You bought it when you knew Amy. "You bought it when you knew how much I wanted it."

"I followed an excellent example in wanting it," declared Clyde. "You wanted it yourself and you can't blame me for approving your choice. I want it for a club, too."

house on fire with a cigarette! I hope that you do it—soon."
"Amiable person." said Lillard with a lazy laugh. "You err in your surmise, though. This is to be a most exclusive club. Not everyone may come into this Land of the Blest."
"'Land of the Blest!' That's a funny name for a club," scoffed Amy. "I suppose that the name was chosen because it is so inappropriate."

"I'm sorry that I ever told you anything about this place," declared Amy. "I shall never make this mistake again, for I am never going to speak to you after this."

"Can you blame me for liking the ace?" asked Lillard gently.

"That's just the trouble." explained
my "You knew that I loved it and That's just the trouble," explained Amy "You knew that I loved it and that I wanted to come here next summer and then you go and buy it and turn it into a horrid club."

"For a lot of noisy men." declared Amy with fire scorn. "I suppose that you'll play poker on the piazza and some day one of you will set the house on fire with a cigarette! I hope that you do it—scorn." ter if it is not overrun by a lot of people. Those girls would complain that there was no bathing, and that it was too far from town and all that sort of thing. The land is better suited to my club. Why not come

'Who else will belong?" demanded

Amy suspiciously:
"Just us two," explained Lillard. "I suppose that the name was chosen because it is so inappropriate."
"Disappointment leads to intemperance of speech," said Lillard. "To the contrary, if I am able to form the club to my liking the title will be most appropriate."

"Just us two," explained Lillard. "I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I hate you when you get master-woon. Can't you drop benefiting mantulation that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."
"Only to the girls?"
"I hate you when you get master-woon. Can't you drop benefiting mantulation."
"I think that I owe it to the girls, "Clyde."

you very badly?'

"And you thought that you could win me by depriving me of the girls' club?" asked Amy. "You might have club?" asked Amy. "You might have known that it was a poor way to plead a suit, even if I ever did have any idea of marrying you—which I never had."

"Do you remember that Graydm place over on the point?" asked Lil-lard irrelevantly. "There is good bathing and plenty of shade and boat-ing and all that sort of thing."

Amy nodded. "It's splendid," she admitted, "and there are little rooms instead of dor-mitories, but father would never buy that for me. "That is to be my "eading present to you," explained Lillard, drawing from his pocket a legal looking docu-ment. "It is only half an hour from here, you can look in every day, and here, you can look in every day, and it is much better for the girls; just as this would be better for us."

"It will be better." admitted Amy.
"I think that I owe it to the girls, came to her for the Paradise Club she tunes began to fall.

caught Amy's attention.

It was built on the very bank of the tiny stream that watered the land and entrance to the front door was over a drawbridge. There was plenty of space in the house and the great

MY WEYMER believed in doing a thing in doing a thing with all her might of tramps and yet close enough to and so it happened to the beautiful to the disposition of the space, and each in highway to be free from the visits of tramps and yet close enough to improve the disposition of the space, and each in highway to be free from the visits of tramps and yet close enough to improve the disposition of the space, and each in would you drive a man from his improved.

"Want to come across?" he cried as he noted her approach.

Would you drive a man from his ingly own property in that fashion:"

"When did you change your name